

APPENDIX A: TELEPHONE CONTACTS

The following five tables contain telephone contacts to help you determine your specific environmental compliance responsibilities.

- The first table, State Environmental Agency Contacts, contains the telephone numbers and addresses of water and air offices in your state's environmental agency.
- The second table, EPA Regions and Regional Office Headquarters, contains the telephone numbers and addresses of Regional headquarters. The regional headquarters' general telephone numbers can refer you to regional contacts for general environmental compliance information.
- The third table, EPA Regional Contacts, contains telephone numbers at the regional level for certain types of compliance information.
- The fourth table contains federal Environmental Protection Agency Hotlines. These Hotline numbers are staffed by experts in federal environment laws. These federal experts may not be able to help you understand the specifics of your state or local environmental requirements, but will be able to answer your general questions.
- The fifth table presents Federal Railroad Administration Regional Offices and associated contact information. These FRA contacts can be used for information on DOT railroad regulations not covered in this handbook as well as for railroad-related worker health and safety issues.

In all cases, these numbers should be considered a starting point for your discussions with state and local officials. If the environmental agency representatives at the other end of the line is not able to help with your specific question, they should be able to refer you to someone who can. Once you have identified a person(s) who can help you with your environmental compliance questions, enter their name and number in the blank telephone list section at the end of this appendix for future reference.

WHAT'S THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A STATE AND REGIONAL AGENCY CONTACT?

The federal EPA, while headquartered in Washington, DC, has ten regional offices across the U.S. The regional offices oversee programs for the state(s) that are run by state environmental agencies, conduct inspections, and cooperate with federal, state, and local agencies, as well as with industry, academic, institutions, and other private groups, to ensure that regional needs are addressed and the federal environmental laws are upheld. In addition, regional offices implement programs for the state (that are not run by that state). You should call your EPA regional office for general information on environmental compliance and potential leads on state and local contacts in your area.

Your state also has its own environmental protection agency. Your state-level agency may have responsibility for implementing and enforcing environmental regulations under many federal laws. For example, authorized state agencies may be responsible for issuing permits under the Clean Water Act or Clean Air Act and may take enforcement actions. In many cases, your state's environmental laws will have stricter requirements than the federal laws discussed in this handbook. Call your state environmental representative for information on the specific requirements of your state's environmental laws.

The telephone numbers below are starting points for discussions with these state agencies. The first person you speak with may not be able to answer your questions. However, they will be able to connect you to someone with relevant information. You should enter your contact's name and telephone number into the contact list at the end of this section for future reference.
